
LADISLAV STACHO, Simon Fraser University
Problems on Geometric Graphs

Classical graph theory problems assume graphs are combinatorial structures given as incidence matrix. Many times these graphs represent communication networks which pose additional properties, for example, a geometric information about the location of vertices. We discuss how this information can help to reduce computational resources, in particular space/memory, and how these algorithms can become local in a sense that at any given time only local subgraph is available to the algorithm to compute next step.