

---

GREG BUCK, Saint Anselm College

What you can see from here: local recognition

It now seems very likely that topoisomerase II, the family of enzymes responsible for detangling DNA, uses a kind of local geometric recognition to read global topology. How does this work? What about the larger picture? What are the possibilities for this sort of geometric recognition? That is, when and why does local information carry a signal about global structure?